

Oscar Wilde is at Long Beach, and last evening delivered a lecture before the guests in the large east dining room of the hotel. He wore the costume, and spoke about half an hour. He talked about how the severity of the war between capital and labor might be mitigated, and condemned the idea that because a thing has been used it is depreciated in value. He declared that the word "secondhand" was vulgar.